

Chapter 2093 Lexi's Rebuttal

In the Larson family mansion, Janet had spent considerable time annotating design drafts for Lexi and reached out to her to collect them.

Lexi, upon receiving Janet's phone call, immediately rushed over.

"Janet!"

After changing her shoes in the hallway, Lexi handed two large bags to Janet.

Instead of taking them, Janet pointed at the bags in confusion and asked, "What are these?"

"I brought fruits and snacks specially for you," Lexi explained with a smile. Seemingly struck by a thought, she added preemptively, "Don't worry, they're all safe for pregnant women."

Janet, however, was poised to politely decline the gifts.

After all, she had fresh fruits delivered to her home daily and didn't need Lexi to go to such trouble on her behalf.

Moreover, as Lexi's employer, it seemed more appropriate for Janet to be buying things for her instead.

Just as Janet was about to speak, however, she noticed an expectant look in Lexi's eyes. At that moment, she couldn't bring herself to decline the offer.

The previous incident about the design had caused quite a stir. Lexi's actions today were likely an attempt to mend their relationship.

In addition to that, Janet felt that it was a well-meaning gesture. To avoid creating an awkward situation, she accepted the bags.

"I appreciate it. Thank you very much," Janet said with a smile as she took the bags.

As expected, Lexi beamed with joy after Janet accepted the gifts. "If you like them, I'll bring you more next time!"

"Thank you," Janet said once again.

The bags were heavy, and with Janet being pregnant, she found them quite cumbersome. She handed them over to the butler to handle.

The pair then exchanged brief greetings and made their way upstairs.

The bedroom, served as Janet's temporary studio, was tidy and serene. She opened a drawer and took out the annotated design drafts.

"I've added some suggestions to the drafts. Take a look. If you have any questions, just let me know. We can discuss them right away," Janet said gently.

"Alright. Thank you, Janet," Lexi said with a smile before lowering her head to carefully examine the drafts.

During this time, Janet sat quietly beside Lexi, waiting patiently for her to finish reading.

After a while, she lifted a hand and rubbed her temples wearily.

Perhaps she hadn't gotten enough rest the previous night. Her head felt like it was being pricked by a needle, with a sensation of numbness beginning to form around it.

Being so absorbed in reviewing the design drafts, Lexi failed to notice Janet's discomfort.

She quickly finished her review and turned to Janet to discuss the drafts.

"Janet, why did you remove my butterfly sleeves? They're in vogue this year."

Bearing her discomfort, Janet looked up at a design page of a white dress.

Despite feeling extremely uneasy, she patiently offered Lexi an explanation.

"The overall style of the dress is simple and elegant. Butterfly sleeves are a bit too fancy and don't quite go with it."

Upon hearing this, Lexi slightly furrowed her brow, clearly disagreeing with Janet's position.

She countered Janet's assertion and presented her own perspective. "I believe that combining conflicting elements is the only way to create impact while delivering originality. I personally prefer that kind of combination."

At that moment, Janet's headache intensified.

"That's just my opinion. If you prefer it that way, stick to it. Every designer has their own unique style, after all," Janet replied, sounding somewhat passive.
